The Station Master's House is a brick house of two storeys, with a two bay front section facing east, behind the south portion of which is a two bay rear wing. Grade slopes to the bound of the stone foundation is above mode in the re-re-

Content character and details indicate that this structure is contemporary with several other structures in the village of Monkton, probably built immediately after the Civil War. Historical research indicates that a house stood on this site in 1850, but physical examination of the existing structure suggests — but does not prove conclusively — that it was built later.

The brick walls are laid in common bond, with every sixth course headers. The front section is bonded with the rear, and there is no joint in the stone cellar walls, indicating that the two sections were built at different times. The first storey of the west or rear wall of the rear wing extends northerly beyond the mass of the wing to terminate a small porch which extends to the front section. This feature may be compared to the original one-bay, one-storey wings which extend from the side of two storey rear wings of several other Monkton houses, including the Godd and Pearce-Stegman. A one storey, shed-roofed front porch is now removed, but an original flashing course, extending beyond the face of the wall, at the second storey windowsill level, and the use of salmon bricks in the space once covered by the roof, suggests the porch was an original feature. The former columns are outlined in paint on the brick wall.

The front door, with its transom, is in the woutherly bay. Windows are 6/6, with louvred blinds. All openings have exposed wood lintels. A door, with a small sheltering porch, once was in the easterly bay of the rear wing's south facade; it is now a window.

The wood cornice terminates in bold returns on the gable ends, and extends, with its generous overhang, up the rakes. A flush end chimney terminates each of the three gables. The roofs are covered with slate.

The front door originally gave access to a narrow hall along the south side, containing a straight, open stair to the second floor. The partition defining the hall is now removed, creating one large room in the front. It has no fireplace, and the chimney is not Vigible. Trim is beaded, but otherwise unmoulded. Doors are paneled but only the front door has mouldings.

Originally, a door into the rear wing was at the west end of the stair hall; it is now closed, but a doorway, north of the former hall, connects the two rooms. The rear room does have a fireplace, and a winding stair north of the chimney formerly rose to the second floor.

The principal staircase has a rather simple turned newel of moderate proportions with a large round walnut handrail and round, plain balusters.

The hall survives in the second storey. The north chimney is expressed in the room as a single flue. The west chimney, in the rear room, has a small fireplace.

An enclosed stair, above the principal stair, gives access to the small unfinished attic. A chimney rises in the southerly gable, but is covered internally, by the staircase at both storeys. Either the chimney is false, for exterior symmetry, or the staircase was added later.

Visible in the attic and in the cellar, structural members are straight auwn and lathing is circular sawn. Rafters are mitered at the ridge. Cut nails are used throughout.

Only the rear chimney is expressed in the cellar, with a large fireplace; the front chimneys are within, and corbeled from, the brick walls above.

James T. Wollon, Jr.
